Speak Up!

Since the economic, Indigenous people have connected to the land in a spiritual way for music. For many nations, music is believed to be created primarily by the spirits. Traditional songs have come about from oral traditions, listening to nature, singer and life experiences. Songs are passed on from generation to generation. In recent years, there has been a renewed interest in Indigenous music. It is often used to connect to spirit and to tell stories. Many Indigenous artists have used their music to bring contemporary issues to the attention of a wider audience. Many artists have also used their music to raise awareness of social and environmental issues. It is an important part of their culture and identity. It is also a way to connect with the wider world and to share their stories. It is a way to celebrate their heritage and to honor their ancestors. It is a way to create a sense of community and to build a better future for all.
